The Influence of Sound

Every day, I walk into a world filled with sound, and for me, some of those sounds pierce through my soul by touching my mood, my thoughts, and everything that composes my being. From the rustling of leaves to the hum of city life, these sounds shape how I navigate my day.

One of the sounds that always touches me is early morning birdsong. There is something about waking up to the chirps of birds outside one's window that is a source of quiet. It feels like a gentle message from nature, certainly great way to start off your day peaceful. It really grounds me and pulls me out of the chaos of my thoughts, gives a sense of peace about the day ahead. It is a mindful moment before activity.

Another pronounced sound could be that of the wind. Be it a soft breeze across the trees or a strong gusty one down the city streets, the sound of the wind relates me to the present. It somehow sounds like the world is breathing a reminder of the natural flow of life. It can be heard in the background while walking or sitting by the window. This brings calmness, but there is an energy at the back that prompts creativity and self-reflection. And lastly, in the silence of near silence, there's this great effect it creates. Instead of the normal sound being exchanged for silence, I have this deep stillness that brings along a sense of clarity. In those moments, seldom am I able to find quiet; in finding them, the quiet moments provided a reset from hitting the pause button on life's noise.
